Blue Light to Stop Train Suicides in Tokyo

Train companies in Tokyo are working to reduce the number of people jumping in front of trains. They are installing blue lights on station platforms to create a more calming atmosphere. The East Japan Railway Company spent almost $170,000 to put the lights in all of the 29 stations on the capital's railway line.

There is an alarming rise in the number of people committing suicide at train stations. This year a total of 68 people threw themselves under trains up to March. This compares with 42 suicides in the same period last year. In 2008, Japan had 2,000 suicides by jumping in front of a train; this makes around six percent of all suicides in the nation.

No one knows if the blue lights will work. There is no evidence to show that blue light reduces suicidal feelings. The Railway Company representative Osamu Okawa said: "We think we have to do something to save lives. We know there is no scientific proof that blue lights stop suicides, but if blue has a relaxing effect on the mind, we want to try it to save lives." A Japanese therapist called Mizuki Takahashi explained her reasons why the blue lights are a good idea: "We associate the colour with the sky and the sea. It has a calming effect on agitated people, or people obsessed with committing suicide," she said. Other companies are watching this experiment with interest.
